Dynamic indications are approximations; use your own discretion and/or follow the natural dynamics of the instrument. Fermatas can be short or long, whichever option you prefer for a particular passage, except for the final note, which should be held for as long as possible.

Tempi are flexible, but the middle section (bars 30 to 64) must be in exactly the durations indicated in the score. Dynamic indications given for the first two figures aren't indications of how to play the rest of the section – they only apply where they are written; the rest is played with uniform piano dynamics as long as the instrument permits it, and louder when it doesn't.

This work is based on a theme (Solo VIII) from an earlier piece: Many Pink Butterflies for flute, clarinet, and vibraphone. The same theme was used to compose another piece, ...au double regard et sept baigneuses, for two guitars and optional crotales. If these two works (i.e. the alto flute solo and the guitar duet) are included in the same program, there should be other pieces separating them from each other.
